Download Microsoft Office 2010 Professional Plus from Microsoft.Q: Why can't you post a recursive definition for a recursive function? I was trying to understand recursion using Haskell and I came across this code: main = f True where f _ = return () I ran into a few problems with it. First, the code only compiles if f has strict fields. This seems to be a restriction that compilers have and I am wondering why. Second, it outputs () upon evaluation of the top-level function. This leads me to believe that it is actually calling itself, but I can't figure out why. I also tried defining a recursive function that doesn't try to call itself, and it worked as expected. I hope I have shown my general level of understanding of Haskell and the code enough to make this a useful question. A: To expand on @Tommy's comment, in Haskell, there is no concept of returning from a function. Any call with a return type of () means that the call returns unit. In your specific example, I think what's happening is: The function f of type [Char] is being called with a list [True] As f returns a unit value, the call returns () On the first call, the left-hand side of the False is the head of the list, so the runtime checks that the second element of the list is True, which is false. This then goes on to pattern match the first element of the list, returning (), and then returning () again. When a function can't figure out the answer to its problem, it can call itself. If that's not allowed, then you are constantly running into dead-ends where
