There are various types of city bus operators, including public transport systems, private hire firms, and specialised charter buses. These companies differ from one another in their particular services as well as their ownership and control structures. Public Transport A public transport system has its own ownership and control over its route system. Therefore, public transport companies do not own or use the rail or road networks in their city. These companies are wholly funded by a city, state, province or country that issues its bills, and grants the bus operator (usually the government department responsible for road traffic) to operate the service (2) A typical public transport system is a bus-only service that operates fixed-route trips between limited stops. Some trips, called commuter buses, are run for a fixed fee and comprise most trips. The remainder are occasional trips, called charter services, which are not quoted in a motorist, but are priced and scheduled to suit the customer's schedule. Private hire services Private hire has its origins with horse-drawn carriages and taxicabs. Private hire is a motorised service that is operated by a private company or individual and is not run by a public or government agency. Private hire services can be owned by individuals or companies. In some cases, private hire operators operate on behalf of a public transport system. Private hire services are usually a privately owned and operated motor vehicle service. Charter bus services A charter bus runs on a set route with a fixed schedule at a fixed price. The charter buses are typically operated as independent contractors from a private hire firm. A charter bus service is a short-term contract with a company that provides "charter" services (i.e. mainly short-term, hire services), usually where no public transport is available or only a very limited
